Everyone has been faced with an ethical dilemma at some point during their life. Given the level of discretion granted to many criminal justice professionals, they are regularly faced with such dilemmas. Some decisions are relatively minor, such as a police officer accepting a cup of coffee from a local restaurant. Other decisions, however, are much more serious, such as knowingly presenting false testimony. The stories written in the paper about such issues often lead us to the question, “what would I do?” Throughout the course of the semester, this class will delve into the various ethical dilemmas that criminal justice professional’s encounter and help you to be able to present a well-articulated argument of “what you would do”. Note that this class is not tailored towards only criminal justice majors. We all read the stories and have an opinion on the unethical events that occur within criminal justice. This is your opportunity to explore these ethical dilemmas in further detail.
